TARIK KISWANSON
10/10/15 - 22/11/15

In Tarik Kiswanson's works, the body is never a full mass or a material reliant on itself. On the contrary, it is a structure, in the proper sense of the term, primarily ephemeral and immaterial, where the space in between plays a major dynamic role. These metal surfaces, carefully crafted by the artist, impose on the viewer a presence that is both ungraspable and threatening due to their hard edges and angles, their slender tips, and their multiple reflections. The oxidized soldering stains take on a pictorial dimension as they splatter all the colors of the spectrum here and there, across the shiny, highly-polished surfaces. Reduced to its frame lines, to its bare bones, a dysfunctional and skeletal furnishing is deliberately stripped of its function as a showcase or as a storage. The artist places it on the floor or hangs it on a wall, sometimes close to some fascinating blind masks (or the negative forms left of their components) hung on the wall like reliefs, and reminiscent of Naum Gabo and Anton Pevsner's experiments in African art. Another remarkable aspect, these paradoxical objects are highly responsive to their spatial environment and also to their observer's proximity. Subtly balanced, they put into play the fascinating elasticity of metal as they vibrate with the contact of a hand or with the displacement of air. Over and beyond their constant historical and cultural resonance, forged in their author's dual Scandinavian and Arab roots, these works seem to stir our need as spectators weary of packaged and spluttering virtual images to react physically to the work.
